WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

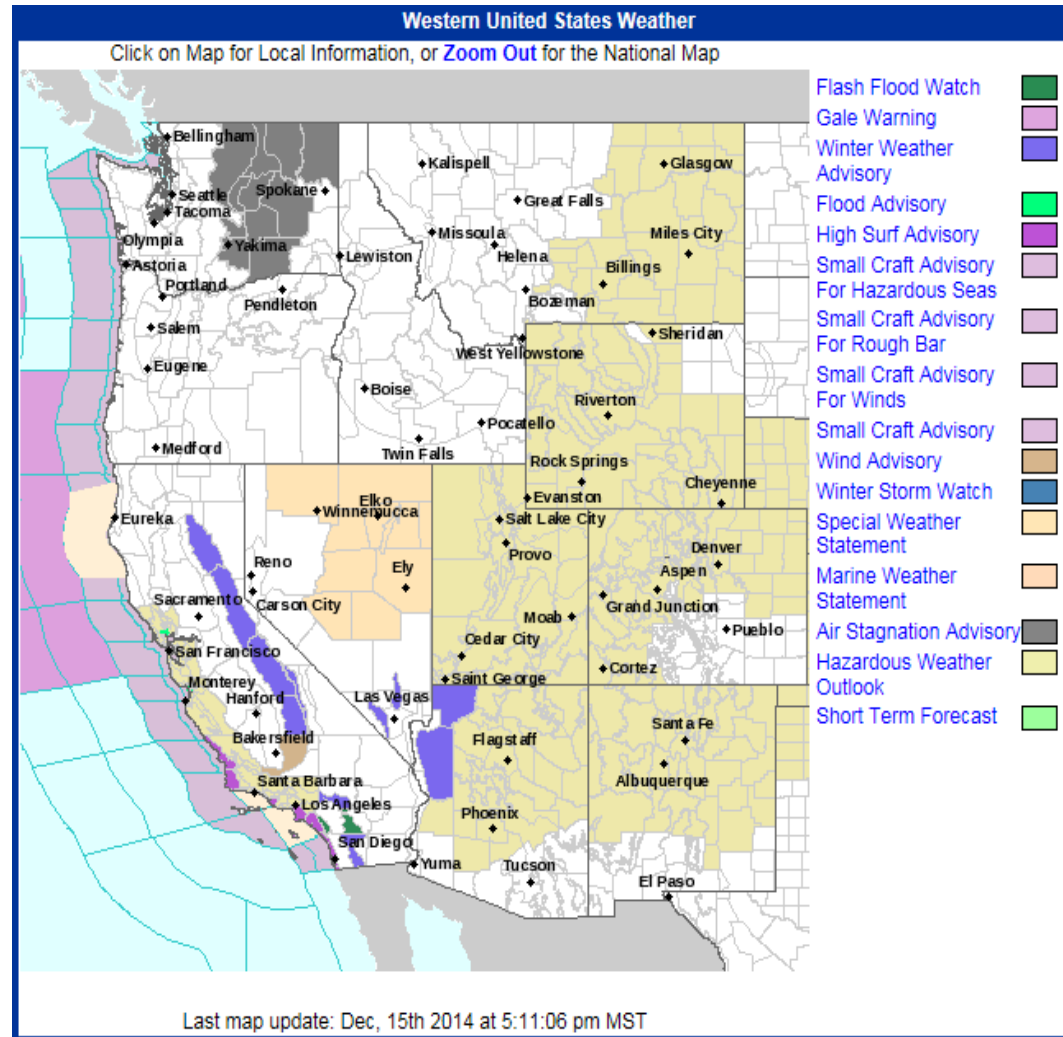

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Another series of wet weather systems will be moving across the region this week, most notably today through Wednesday and again Friday. These systems are a little colder than the recent ones and snow levels will be lower (3000-4000 feet in the north, 4500-5000 feet in the south). Snow accumulation at the lower elevations will be few inches while a couple of feet are possible at the higher elevations. There will be some periods of moderately strong, gusty south to southwest winds in the higher mountain areas as well with these next few systems. There will be a break in between systems Thursday, but moist, rather cloudy conditions will continue that day. Friday's weather system will bring in more precipitation across all of Northern Operations, and Saturday looks wet in the far north and mostly cloudy elsewhere. However, there is currently quite a bit of uncertainty as to the strength of the weekend system. For now, drying conditions are expected in most areas Sunday through the middle of next week, except there also appears to be some chance of precipitation in the northwest corner of the state again next Monday.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A couple of Pacific storms will bring periods of showers to the region through Wednesday night. Most locations over Central California will receive between 1 and 2 inches of rainfall while most locations over Southern California will receive between a half inch and an inch of rainfall through Wednesday night. The snow level will be around 5,000 feet across Central California and around 6,000 feet across Southern California through Tuesday night. The snow level will drop to 4,000 feet across Central California and 5,000 feet across Southern California on Wednesday. Southerly winds of 20 to 30 mph with gusts to 50 mph will surface across the mountain ridges of Central California through Tuesday night. These winds will turn westerly on Wednesday and affect all of the mountain ridges and desert passes. A weak ridge of high pressure will bring dry conditions to the region Thursday. A weak storm with scattered light showers is possible Friday through this weekend. Temperatures will be below normal across the region through this weekend.
